~EXCERPT~

"Get in there, you ornery hunk of steaks," Maddie Rose gritted out through clamped teeth while thrusting all of her weight into pushing the cattle trailer's rear gate closed. A hard task since her hundred twenty pounds didn't hold up against Buford's two thousand pound bulk. Needless to say, despite all of her shoving and pushing. Despite all of her exertion. Buford's big, hairy rump hadn't budged even an inch! Nope, there it was—hanging out over the back end of the trailer. Firmly in the way of the latch.

"C'mon, only a few more inches," she coaxed, pushing, giving it everything she had. But the bull wasn't buying it. He didn't budge.

"Arrrg," she growled, frustration nearly getting the better of her.

This should have been a piece of cake—an easy load-up. Ha!

Bull-headed Buford messed that up deciding he wanted off rather than on.

Just Maddie's luck.

And what was new about that? "Nothing," she grumbled.

Obviously, she didn't belong anywhere.

Maybe before that, but unlike most people Maddie had no recollection, no records, nothing...as far as her life record went she hadn't existed until that day in the post office when she was found.

If she'd been a whiner she wouldn't have made it.

No, Maddie was a survivor so she'd grown used to days like today. But it sure was getting old.

Buford's attitude was a sharp reminder she'd better not get comfortable with the good fortune that had recently come her way.

Owner.

The thought dazzled her. Like a beautiful sparkly gift under the Christmas tree that she knew had to belong to someone else...an
